From Trash to Treasure: How One Man Turns Industrial Castoffs into Gold

"You can't wrap your mind around how wasteful America is until you run a waste company." - Damon Carson

Damon Carson's inbox might just be one of the most fascinating in America. Every day, from his Denver office, he sifts through a flood of emails from companies desperate to offload surplus materials. And we're not talking about household clutter—no outdated couches or broken microwaves here. Instead, picture multi-national corporations looking to unload thousands of pounds of industrial leftovers, from surplus chemicals to miles of unused rope. Often, this material has no obvious second life, no clear market, and in most cases, it's headed straight for the landfill—until Carson steps in.

Among the countless inquiries he received, one company offered surplus rolls of fabric designed to cover domed sports stadiums. Another needed to get rid of 20,000 kilograms of barium sulfate that didn't meet manufacturing specs. A major outdoor brand reached out with nearly 800 pounds of blue rope, once used for cooler handles, now rendered obsolete. The kicker? The company was even willing to cover shipping costs just to keep it out of a dumpster. "They're a bit of a tree-hugging company," Carson explains. "They don't want to just throw it away. Nor should they—because it has value."

Damon Carson stands in a half cut mining truck tire, holding a street sweeper brush.

Defining that value and finding a buyer is where Carson thrives. He calls himself a "waste speculator" or a "materials gambler." His game? Betting that someone, somewhere, will see potential in 8,000 leftover cooler-handle ropes. And for over a decade, his company, repurposedMATERIALS, has been winning that bet.

Unlike traditional recycling, which breaks down materials to create something new, Carson specializes in rehoming items in their original form. His inventory is as unconventional as his business model. Old fire hoses, no longer fit for high-pressure water, become protective bumpers for boat docks. Discarded conveyor belts from factories transform into ballistic curtains for shooting ranges. Street-sweeper brushes? Perfect back-scratchers for livestock. Even billionaire Ted Turner, owner of the largest bison herd in the U.S., has been a customer.

But every so often, Carson gets a material he's never even heard of. "I just got a bunch of ceramic paper," he says."I didn't even know ceramic paper was a thing."

(For the record, it's a thin, fire-resistant insulator used in aircraft and industrial kilns.) His challenge? Figuring out who might need it—often by tapping into his extensive network of customers and industry insiders. If capitalism is an engine of constant production and waste, Carson has positioned himself as a master of "repurposing' its castoffs.

America's Waste Problem

The United States is, by all accounts, one of the most wasteful nations in the world. According to the EPA, the country generated 292.4 million tons of municipal solid waste in 2018 alone—that's about 4.9 pounds per person per day. And that's just household trash; industrial waste is even harder to quantify but estimated in the billions of tons annually. Carson's work stands at the intersection of environmental necessity and business savvy. His company diverts millions of pounds of discarded material from landfills every year, and he's turned that mission into a thriving enterprise. But his journey to becoming the "King" of "repurposed" materials wasn't exactly planned.

After selling a waste business and dabbling in laundromats and trailer parks, he couldn't shake the memory of what he had seen working in waste management: perfectly usable materials, trashed simply because no one knew what to do with them. "You can't wrap your mind around how wasteful America is until you run a waste company," he says.

A lifelong bargain hunter, Carson has always been drawn to secondhand goods—his wardrobe from Goodwill, his truck bought used with 180,000 miles. So when an airbrush artist mentioned discarded billboard vinyls made great drop cloths, Carson's curiosity was piqued. He bought 20 used billboards for $140 and listed them on Craigslist. Farmers snapped them up as tarps for covering hay bales. A lightbulb went off.

From there, Carson began to scale. Conveyor belts from mining operations became windbreaks for cattle ranchers. Old steel cables from ski lifts found a second life with the Bureau of Land Management. Even bowling alley planks, their triangular pin markers still visible, were "repurposed" for DIY projects. The business took off, fueled by Carson's knack for seeing alternative uses for seemingly useless materials.

Marketing the Unmarketable

What sets Carson apart isn't just his knack for sourcing unique materials—it's his ability to sell them. Traditional marketing thrives on branding and price perception. Carson flips that. When he needed a replacement window-blind cord, the store's "official" one was $10, while an identical rope in the hardware section was $4. The difference? Marketing.

That mindset drives repurposedMATERIALS. Police departments once paid $3 per square foot for ballistic curtains—until Carson sold them . half-inch-thick conveyor belts for a fraction of the price. They worked better and cost less. "repurposing" is about seeing one industry's waste as another's solution.

One Man's Trash, Another's Treasure

At Carson's six warehouses, his inventory reads like an industrial oddity shop: ski-lift cables, burlap coffee sacks, wooden wine barrels. Nautical ropes once anchored ships; now they await creative buyers—maybe for a giant tug-of-war game. Even highway guardrails find new life as fencing.

His business isn't just about waste reduction—it's about redefining value. When a brewer had 30,000 pounds of expired sugar, Carson found a beekeeper who eagerly took it. "Do you think the bees care it's expired?" the buyer joked.

Carson's success lies in seeing value where others don't. While some focus on recycling within industries, repurposedMATERIALS thrives on cross-category innovation. Its customers—farmers, builders, artists, environmentalists—all look beyond labels.

At its core, Carson's work changes how we view waste. "Is it hollow? Magnetic? UV-protective?" he asks, when assessing materials. More often than not, he finds a use. His success proves that with creativity, yesterday's trash becomes tomorrow's solution.

And in a world drowning in waste, that's a gamble worth taking.
